FROM THE ACTING COMPANY'S ARTISTIC DIRECTOR

In 2003, I had the great good fortune to direct August Wilson's KING HEDLEY II for the Alliance Theatre. August Wilson came to Atlanta and continued to revise the script and rehearse with our company. During the opening August signed a poster for me saying "THE STRUGGLE CONTINUES ... ". As always, August was prescient and indeed even now in 2024-25, the struggle continues. Our current political climate in America continues to illustrate the sense of dislocation and exclusion that many African Americans feel. In TWO TRAINS RUNNING August Wilson's characters are on the precipice in American, struggling to stake their claim to a piece of the American Dream. It is a story about questioning your place in the world and amidst the turbulent 1960's these brilliant, witty, wry, and eloquent characters strive to thrive and realize the promise made by this great Country to all of its citizens.

TWO TRAINS RUNNING challenges our sense of how we identify and define ourselves, as well as how others project their perceived values of us onto our day to-day lives. The play wonders if the tension between these two perspectives can ever be resolved, and if so... HOW? August Wilson doesn't give us concise answers. In TWO TRAINS RUNNING, characters must cultivate their own hope but Wilson believes we are ever resilient and so we endure. These are but a few of the reasons why August Wilson's TWO TRAINS RUNNING is more necessary, essential, and vital than ever before.
